

CHAP. II.

The Entrance into the Enchanted

WHEN any person, whether a gentleman or a poor labourer, it makes no difference) hath a shew his son the castle, or get him as a scholar, he must knock at the west side; or, if he should happen to know the way of it, which times the case, there are many gentlemen in the piazzas and thoroughfares who will readily direct him, and give him a fine bow into the bargain here (and I think it ought to be so) the young masters are all well-natured and very mannerly; they would be sure to snarl if you were so soon then as the door is open, and will be immediately, for they do not like to make people wait, no not even for a moment, neither do they run gap
